I feel that Adobe would benefit from a more detailed user interface. Apparently, it is not an easy task. Every other software house is doing it, and if we have been using Photoshop for 25 years, why not have it? Well, perhaps because it's the only Adobe product everyone loves, including Adobe employees. About a year ago, I would have told you that Samsung's best shot comes from the product's name. However, I am not quite sure of that anymore. In fact, I did go as far as mentioning that I was going to give the portrait mode feature and the Glare Eraser a miss after using them extensively, just because I felt that there's not much to speak about those features. Even so, I was very happy with the Wide Gamut EXIF support, and the new makeovers, which do not fall into the "two-step" category. And let's not forget the Smart Camera Selector tool. Compared to the likes of Magic Lantern, it's extremely powerful. Not that it was needed: the improved autofocus, the already great HDR mode (for which I give it a recommendation), and the general overall speed were quite good already. It didn't add anything new, but it simply made the whole experience more fun. I'm still amazed by how the Samsung does its "Paint Stuff on the RAW image" and this is why I love this feature. Once again, Lightroom is quite an impressive application. The new workflow-oriented platform is described and reviewed extensively, but I found it odd that so many of you do not appreciate its potential. Lightroom enables you to store all your raw-files in a single folder, organize them and view one image at a time with annotation tools, like what Photoshop was doing for many years. Lightroom also supports some non-destructive modes, like Material and Lens Optimization (a.k.a. lens profile settings). It also lets you pick from a number of raw formats (JPEG, TIFF, DNG, CR2, etc.) and easily adjust white balance, exposure, color, contrast, etc. The Import module helps you to decide which image you want to work with, while the full feature-set available in the main tool is already quite impressive, again, not to mention the incredible RAW converter. I have tried a number of application-based RAW converters over the years: ViewNX 10, Capture NX, and so on. Lightroom... is different.
